

In the beginning of time, one god was created. This god brought light into the world, and the world was warmed. When he was lonely, he created a second god for company, and they would entertain each other with simple, competitive sporting activities. The first god created the earth, and filled it with both warm and cold climates. The second god traveled to earth and became very intrigued with the cold, snowy landscapes he found there. When he returned to heaven, he told the first god that they should play games in the cold climate, which he called winter. They disagreed because the first god believed that sports should only be played in warm climates, which he called summer. As a result of their disagreements, the sports that they played against each other turned very competitive and mean-spirited. The god of Antagonism sprung from the competition of the two gods, and he told them that it was right to compete in a mean-spirited way. As he spread evil through the heavens, the god of Mediation was created in order to show the two gods that they could play sports for fun. Mediation advocated for peace, and the two gods were soon able to play sports again without getting angry with one another. Both winter and summer sports were accepted as holy.

As Mediation settled things in heaven, the competition between the two gods became monotonous because they always had the same opponent. The gods had a new idea, which was to create people called Olympians to play with. With a growing number of Olympians, some were labeled as elite, and only the elite could compete against the gods. Some Olympians played all of the sports, but some just focused on one sport. The gods held Olympic games, which were held every two years, and rotated between winter and summer Olympics to honor both groups of gods. After the gods created the Olympians and the earth, they created humans to inhabit the earth. The Olympians traveled to earth and taught humans to worship Olympianism. The Olympians passed to the humans that they should practice sports everyday, and they should perform their given gifts/talents to show respect and to entertain the Gods every four years at the Olympics. Every four years, no matter the state of international relations at the time, there should be world peace and friendly competition among mankind. The gods eventually let one Olympian become a god, but he was influenced by the evil god of Antagonism. He eventually used his skills to espionage the gods and create a place to counter heaven. The other gods put a curse on this realm and it became a place where sports would never be played and he would live eternally in laziness and sloth. He joined Antagonism in this realm, and neither could ever return to the heavens again. This is the unfortunate afterlife for those who do not practice Olympianism. On Earth, the gods test and weed out the people that do not belong in the heavens, and which ones belong in the damned realm of laziness. The best athletes and the top competitors at each Olympic games are considered "saints" and are granted a place in the heavens to compete against the gods. Very few are given this talent, and though it may be envied by other competitors, it is accepted and should not be dwelled upon. The people that believe in Olympianism but do not practice sports are sent to live with the god of Mediation in the afterlife in a realm of peace. Before being admitted into heaven however, there is a test that each person must pass in order to be granted access. For Olympians, or people who spent their lives thriving in the physical world of sports, they are given a physical test to determine whether or not they are serious enough to spend eternity with the god of their respective sport. If the Olympian fails the test, they are sent to live a peaceful life with mediation, but no serious competition. Those who are spectators are given a test of knowledge pertaining to sporting events and famous things that happened in the world of sports. Those who passed are granted access to a peaceful eternity with Mediation as well. Those who fail this test are sent to spend eternity with Antagonism and suffer an everlasting life of laziness and sloth. Medalists in the Olympic games are considered the most holy, and they are sent directly to the realm of their respective sport and to compete against other medalists and the god of that sport for eternity. Medalists completely bypass the testing necessary for others to gain access to heaven.
